Communication within the CNS is initiated by the senses, by movement (e.g., walking, performing exercises), and by emotions and memory, and is finally communicated to the brain and spinal cord via nerves. Interneurons are nerve cells that carry signals within and between different parts of the CNS. A very sophisticated and complex neuroanatomical and neurochemical network provides for proper functioning of the brain. The neuroanatomical network is comprised of the neuronal cells, brain cells, fiber cells (axons and dendrites), and synapses that interconnect the cells. The nerve cells (neurons) send messages through the axons that connect the cells. While many parts of the brain are connected by nerve cells, many other parts are not connected, and thus, the ability of the brain to communicate is limited, as is the number of ways in which one brain neuron may communicate with other neurons. Synapses are connections between nerve cells or neuron cell bodies that generally contain small amount of neurotransmitter (drupelet), and which can either receive or send messages (information) over the length of a neuron. Synapses are mainly found in the brain and spinal cord. The chemical at the synapse that transmits or
